Celebrating 2 Two Years

Presidents Message

I am experiencing an overall attitude of “The Lone Ranger” in the photography community in the Southern Georgia area and I am not fond of it. That's why we need to stick together. I attended a free seminar in Jacksonville this past Tuesday at the Jacksonville Professional Photographers Guild with around 90 photographers and was reminded that there can exist a community of people who gather for a common goal. They are there to draw from each other and to give back. I was a part of that guild before moving to Georgia and wonder why it is different here. I am looking to possibly join again and also check out some other gatherings in the area. Wouldn't you like to come? I hope so.

Photographs In History

James Nachtwey couldn't get an assignment in 1992 to document the spiraling famine in Somalia. Mogadishu had become engulfed in armed conflict as food prices soared and international assistance failed to keep pace. Yet few in the West took much notice, so the American photographer went on his own to Somalia, where he received support from the International Committee of the Red Cross. Nachtwey brought back a cache of haunting images, including this scene of a woman waiting to be taken to a feeding center in a wheelbarrow. After it was published as part of a cover feature in the New York Times Magazine, one reader wrote, "Dare we say that it doesn't get any worse than this?" The world was similarly moved. The Red Cross said public support resulted in what was then its largest operation since World War II. One and a half million people were saved, the ICRC's Jean-Daniel Tauxe told the Times, and "James' pictures made the difference."

Location St. Augustine Alligator Farm

When: Thursday March 22nd

Speaker: Olis Garber

Benny Laircy and myself set out on a photographic journey of sorts with the final destination being the St. Augustine Alligator Farm. On the way we stopped to photograph a few rusty trucks and take a tour of former guest speaker Kevin Floyd of Kevin Floyd Photography & Studio located in Green Cove Springs, Fl. Kevin showed off some of his prize antique cameras he had recently purchased and gave us some tips for studio shortcuts and hacks. After leaving his studio we grabbed a quick light lunch saving room for some fried shrimp we would devour later that evening at O'Steens in St. Augustine. We met Master Photographer Olis Garber along with William Hinesley at 4:00pm at the Alligator Farm and Olis gave us some instruction on how to get great images while photographing the birds. Here are a few shots from the evening.
